WAYNE LEVIN (b. 1945)

Levin began his interest in photography when his father gave him a Brownie camera and film-developing kit for his 12th birthday. He went on to study at the Brooks Institute of Photography where he participated in the Civil Rights movement with camera at hand. After being discharged in 1968 from serving in Vietnam for two years, Levin traveled the world to document images before settling in Hawaii with his family. Levin earned his BFA and MFA in photography on the mainland where he worked and taught for several years until he married and settled for good in Hawaii in 1990. Today, Levin is renowned for his portrayal of swimmers, surfers, divers and sea-life all taken below the water's surface. Rather than documenting sub-aquatic nature and human activity per se, his pictures capture the mystery and awe of a world where light is refracted into mercurial shadows, where a dense darkness and the vastness of the unknown is present. Some of his photographs are so nuanced they take on the appearance of charcoal drawings. Levin's work has been exhibited nationally and internationally, and is held in major public collections such as the MoMA in New York.
